

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

This thesis is a collective product. Not only does it embody the ideas of many people, but it also embraces the direct contributions of many friends and colleagues and for this reason it carries the meaning it does for me.

Having Professors James Breeden, Noam Chomsky and Bennett Harrison as the official readers and advising committee made the production of this thesis an especially enriching experience. Their involved reading was most inspiring to me. I learned a great deal from their criticism and suggestions. Each from a distinctly different background made such a complementary contribution to the development of this study. For all the precious efforts and thoughts they put into this work, I wish to express my warmest thanks and appreciation. I am grateful to Professor Chomsky for making the information at his disposal so generously available to me and for referring me to sources of information which became central to my analysis.

Sandy Congleton made the great transformation from illegible writing characterized by terrible spelling and often hanging and endless sentences to this readable manuscript. I appreciate her commitment and value the friendship that emerged from this long struggle.

Jeff Coulter read major parts of this thesis. I am grateful to his critical comments and was inspired by his help and encouragement.

Discussions with Jomo Sundaram and Vicente Navarro were very helpful in clarifying theoretical aspects of this study.

Also invaluable to me in this respect was the experience of teaching
