

in response to the essential internationalization of capital and concomitant with the penetration of Palestinian labor. It focuses on the concentration of industrial capital and transformations in the rural frontiers. These transformations are likely to offset the effect of proletariat segmentation with regard to the material prerequisites for proletarian alliance. They signify secularization of the relations of production were dictated by the sectarian Labor-Zionist ideology. Secularization can only affect more favorably the material prerequisites for cross-national proletarian alliance.

Chapter VIII:

Conclusions of thesis. What was and was not achieved of the objectives we set for ourselves in this study. The findings regarding the determinants of the current proletarianization of Palestinians in Israel, and the objective conditions promoting and impeding cross-national proletarian alliance. Emerging questions for future research.